It is said that the Catholic church breathes inspiration nowhere more divinely than in the sweetly mournful offices for the dead, and never refore in Memphis were the offices for the dead celebrated with such solemnity and impressiveness as they will be at St. Bridget's on this occasion. Three bishops—Bishop Feehan, of Nashville: Bishop Bran, of St. Louis; and Bishop Fitzgerald, of Little Bock—with a large array of priests of the diocese, will be present and take part in the eeremonies. The church will be draped in emblems of mourning, and nothing will be omitted to make the occasion worthy the memory of the illustrious dead.

The following resolutions of respect to the memory of Miss Laura Flack and Miss Lizzle Lyon, both of the Peabody school, were presented by the committee and unanimously adapted.

Your committee appointed to draft a suitable expression of sorrow, rave to say that we knew these young ladies long and intimately, having been associated with them as teachers in the same school for years, and it affords us great pleasure to teatify to the blameless purity of their lives, and the earnest, falthful work they did in their laborious galling. They were beloved by their pupils and associates, and honored and respected by all. It will be a sad reassembling for us when we meet together once more after this long, terrible summer, to miss our friends in their accustomed places. But it is well with them—they lived consistent christian lives, and they have only gone home where there will be no more sorrow and suffering.

We are dealed the sad privilege of offering our sympathy to the families of these young ladies, for not one member is left of either household! Miss Flack, with her mother, three sisters and two hrothers, and Miss Lyon, with her mother, two slaters and a brother, are all sleeping in new-made graves in our stient city.

The epidemic of 1878 presents us with many sorrowful incidents, but none more inexpressible sad than these.
